

While deep convolutional neural networks (CNNs) have achieved impressive success in image denoising with additive white Gaussian noise (AWGN), their performance is often limited by the lack of a clear understanding of the underlying noise structure. This paper explores the relationship between the noise level and the denoising performance of CNNs, and proposes a novel method for improving denoising performance by incorporating a noise-aware loss function.