Subspace clustering methods based on data self-expression have become very popular for learning from data that lie in a union of low-dimensional linear subsp